When All That Rests Is Literature: Traces, Transcriptions and Remnants of Great Speeches

Abstract: Barbu Ștefănescu Delavrancea's public career (around 1880-1918) is marked not only by the tragic predicament of literary verbosity, but also by a sense of dissolution implied in the very nature of the art of eloquence. Being endowed with a Byronic nature, the Romanian writer experiences the irreducible tension between spoken and written words, and tends to solve it by assuming a pseudonym, a fake identity. The present essay shows that, in Delavrancea's case, the unsteady identity of the orator – corresponding to "the name issue" tackled in his early political speeches and to the reduplication of pseudonyms in his youth literature – leads to a reduplication of texts (recycled and rewritten versions coexist with the originals) and to paradoxical political attitudes (the embodiment of consciousness explains moral shortcomings).

Keywords: Byron; Pathos; Emulation; Pseudonym; Energy; Entropy; Number; Party; People; Imagines Agentes.

1. Transcribing the Sensorium of Byronic Heroes. Erasure and Admiration

It is reported that some of the nineteenth-century great writers would have given all their literary awards for a moment of triumph in war. Their obsession with eloquence has been already discussed, especially in the frame of the heroic cult nurtured by Napoleon and the Napoleonic wars. Even though there is no apparent determination between them, ancient rhetoricians such as Tacitus and Cicero<sup>1</sup> point out that the art of fine speaking appeared in the aftermath of the Peloponnesian wars, as a result of the society's indulging in effeminate luxury and moral decay. In fact, Quintilian considers that attack and defense are the archetypal impulses of ars bene dicendi; thus, analogies such as rhetorical-sword, orator-soldier or polemic-battle/war do not seem so far-fetched for him.<sup>2</sup> Turning to the Homeric epic, we can discover that whenever the siege of Troy was ceasing, Ulysses and Nestor used to engage themselves in eloquence competitions,<sup>3</sup> as
